Overview:
Nursing education has become increasingly biomedical, resulting in blurring of the caring foundation upon which nursing is based (Erickson et al., 2017; Hills & Watson, 2011). Numerous social, legislative, regulatory, educational and health system issues inform this shift. Nursing educators experience numerous challenges including fewer numbers, decreasing resources and the increasing pressure to prepare graduates who will be successful on licensing and certification examinations, which are largely biomedical; integrating holism into curricula may seem impossible. Yet nursing is a caring profession – graduates should be prepared to fully care for self and other. This discussion will illuminate the issues, barriers and outcomes when nurses are not able to live their social/moral imperative to care.

Learning Outcomes:
At the conclusion of this activity, learners will be able to:

• Apply knowledge and insights related to social, legislative, regulatory, educational and health system issues that inform nursing education into their holistic self-development and nursing practice.
